Explanation:

Thom came to me wanting to find a new challenge. He thrives on helping flailing or underperforming businesses become profitable, as well as growing startup businesses. He was gainfully employed and doing well, but he wanted to see what other challenges may be available to him.

He is also in a company where there is little turnover. His chances of moving up are limited. He was looking for not only a new challenge, but also a step up in title and pay. Experience is seen as an advantage rather than a detriment in his line of work; therefore, it was important to him to showcase his 20 years as a sales leader.

Thom was conducting quite a bit of networking and wanted something less traditional to show when asked for his resume. He wanted it to be easy to scan with bottom-line facts and figures. He did not want to rely on LinkedIn to help showcase his track record because his managers and peers are active on LinkedIn.

He was extremely happy with this resume and got a terrific offer within 30 days after uploading it and sharing it directly. HR was able to read his resume after uploading without any problems. I told him, there was a chance that the graphs would not go through, but we covered the same information within the text. Fortunately, the graphs appeared just fine when he uploaded, as did all of the colors. I am finding that to be more of the norm with my clients these days.
